ABOUT THE HIGH WATER SEASON:

Our high water season runs from December through May—summer and autumn in the Southern Hemisphere. It is our cooler and wet season, but keep in mind that we get only a more than half (60%) of our total rainfall during the high water season, and that it is hot in the Amazon any time of year. During the high water season the average temperature is 86 °F (30° C), 12 degrees cooler than in the low water season. There are great benefits to traveling at this time of year. Perhaps most important, is each rivers, creek, streams and lake are navigable. You will get to explore more of the waterways of Amazonia, and will have access to plant life and wildlife area that you might miss during the low water season. Also, the travelers will be much closer to the jungle canopy, where monkeys play and our beautiful Amazon birds like to roost. In fact, you are very likely to see many more mammals, both monkeys and others, during the high-water season. Increased navigability by water has the flip side that areas to walk and hike are sometimes limited at this time, and if we do find usable hiking trails there will be more mosquitoes than in the low water season. Fishing is more limited during these months too.

ABOUT THE LOW WATER SEASON:

The Low water Season in Amazonia coincides with our winter in the Southern Hemisphere (from June to November). This the warmer season, with temperature averaging about 98°F (36°C), and, despite its name, the low water season still gets some heavy rains. A key difference is that trails and jungle paths are now easily accessible, allowing groups to explore deep in the jungle (accompanied by fewer mosquitoes than during the high water season). The flip side of that, however, is that water levels are about 23 feet lower from June to November, which means that many of the creeks and lakes that we visit during the high water season are inaccessible. Lower water levels, however, can be a bonus in another way: During these months fishing is 100 percent guaranteed.
